ENDANGERED SPECIES

Bradypus variegatus
FATRO "WILDLIFE" COLLECTION

The brown-throated sloth is a delightful animal which lives in the rain forests of Central and South America. It eats leaves, fruit and shoots which it finds in trees and satisfies a good part of its water needs from the lymph of the plants. However, there is a difference between males and females: while the males remain in just one tree, the females jump from one tree to another until the young have grown.
The brown-throated sloth is famous for its slowness, although in water it is an excellent swimmer and can become quick and aggressive in situations of danger. Sloths are in decline owing to the loss of their habitat, caused by human activities.
